As US President Donald Trump cancels his meeting with the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-un, we look back over a long and often turbulent geopolitical relationship. A look at the relationship between the United States and North Korea since the Cold War. Image: REUTERS/KCNA. 19 Dec 2017. A planned summit between the United States and North Korea has been cancelled after US President Donald Trump withdrew. In a letter to North Korean leader Kim Jong-un, Trump said: “Sadly, based on the tremendous anger and open hostility displayed in your most recent statement, I feel it would be inappropriate, at this time, to have this long-planned meeting.”

South Korea–United States relations refers to international relations between the Republic of Korea (South Korea) and the United States of America. Relations have been extensive since 1950, when the United States helped establish the modern state of South Korea, also known as the Republic of Korea, and fought on its UN-sponsored side in the Korean War (1950–1953). During the subsequent four decades, South Korea experienced tremendous economic, political and military growth, and significantly reduced its US military footprint. Mexico and the United States share a highly integrated economic relationship. There seems to be an assumption among many Americans, including officials in the current administration, that the relationship is somehow one-sided, that is, that Mexico is the sole beneficiary of commerce between the two countries. Yet, economic benefits to both countries are extensive. Mexico has played a significant role in the rapid expansion of US exports in the 1990s and 2000s. Finally, Mexico also influences the US economy through tourism in the same way that American tourists play a central role in Mexico’s economy. In 2014, 75 million foreigners visited the United States, generating $221 billion dollars.
